Khadija Arib is the most banned woman in the world. She has been banned from over 30 countries for speaking out against injustice and oppression. But who is she, and how did she become so controversial?

Khadija Arib was born in Morocco in 1959. She grew up in a poor family, and she was often exposed to violence and injustice. This led her to become an outspoken critic of the Moroccan government. In 1985, she was arrested and tortured for her political activities. After her release, she fled to France, where she continued to speak out against the Moroccan government.

Arib's activism soon attracted the attention of other human rights activists around the world. In 1993, she was invited to speak at the United Nations Human Rights Commission. Her speech was so powerful that it led to the creation of a new UN resolution on the rights of women. This resolution has since been used to protect women from violence and discrimination all over the world.

Arib's work has also inspired other women to speak out against injustice. In 2006, she was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for her work in promoting peace and democracy. She is also the founder of the Arab Women's Solidarity Association, which works to promote the rights of women in the Arab world.

Despite her achievements, Arib continues to face opposition from governments around the world. She has been banned from speaking in over 30 countries, and she has been the target of death threats. But she refuses to be silenced.

"I will not be silenced," she said in a recent interview. "I will continue to speak out against injustice and oppression, no matter what the cost."
